I was encouraged by the positive feedback I've received from my usual disclaimers about this project — I know going in that I'm designing for a specific audience and that this doesn't reflect all communities. For example, in my hometown we've been noticing a lot of convenience services being pulled up from their pedestals, making food out of the house. My experience tells me that specifically in sites that don't see much traffic, this might be a good fit because the time savings is really awesome. Another thing I'm not taking into account is the full spectrum of human differences that exist. I get that in some instances everyone is able to contribute in a manner, and in others it's not going to work for everyone. What if a certain kind of autistic person needs to handle their own bills? What if someone is deaf? For the sake of this project I can't guarantee anything, so I'm choosing to get started with my good information because that was tons more education for me than anything else could have been. Take these precautions as a point of departure when designing for your community. For more warnings and disclaimers pertaining to this project, visit the "smart or dumb?" tag. Powered by DM.
