I'm slow. I'm slow because I'm a martial artist. How this applies to aikido is that this is a slow and gradual process. I will teach my life to be disciplined slow, deliberate and graceful over time and experience. This will keep me from making the mistakes of youth. That's not what I was thinking. No, really. I really do make mistakes. As any good aikido teacher, I attempt to be open and teach by example. This can be quite a challenge. I've found that since I've been teaching longer, I've had to learn to watch more closely. This means watching for non-verbal cues which are either not being managed or are not being used properly. I'm slow. I'm slow because I'm a martial artist. You can teach someone to be slow. You can teach someone to be slow by causing them to do their best to be slow. Think about that. You can teach someone to be slow. Is that the only way? That is certainly one way. We often try to be good examples of what we teach. These are great teachers. Another way to teach slow and deliberate things is by creating a permissive environment. This creates a learning environment that allows mistakes to be made. Mistakes happen in everyday life. That's the way we learn. This is a martial art. This doesn't mean that mistakes are unacceptable. Sometimes we do not learn when we are not allowed to make mistakes. A well designed environment encourages the learning to come from within. The goal is to think slow. The goal is to
