This new version of Photoshop boasts a new tone mapping tool. It is not new technology, as it has been in Lightroom 5, but the new tone mapping tool in Photoshop is faster and simpler to use. It is available in the workflow as a preprocessing post-processing tool, and it provides simplified control of sliders. You can also create custom tone mapper adjustment layers that can have many different properties, from Channel Mixer to Hue Saturation to Curves. Live Crop lets you scale a photo right in Photoshop. You can crop photos to a specific percentage while resizing. You can also resize photos to a given percentage even though you may have not applied the crop. In the Display panel, you can create a Preview and/or Highlight layer, and you can then use them to apply preview or highlight adjustments. These allow you to see how previous adjustments will affect the outcome of a photo. You set the preview layer through the image layer adjustment by clicking on the preview layer icon in the Layer palette. In the Options bar, you have the option of disabling the Watermark tool. This allows you to have one less tool to use, since the auto-watermark has always been there. But, if I understand correctly, you can always watermark with the Watermark Tool and the Watermark overlay. One of the major strides in Lightroom is the ability to edit RAW files and other non-JPG files without converting them to JPG. It is now possible to open RAW files with a new RAW Toolbox panel. RAW files can be opened without conversion if they are selected in the Develop module. Selecting the RAW button in the panel opens the RAW Toolbox, so that you can open and edit an image as a RAW file. The RAW Toolbox has tools for white balance, exposure, color and black point. You have the ability to fine-tune your photo's image quality, as well as precision tools for brush selection, even for photo adjustments, such as exposure, halo, noise reduction and others. It does exist in Lightroom
