There are also many improvements made within the RAW processing of Lightroom: many of the Plug-ins and Effect plugins are now built with iOS in mind, meaning for a first operation preview, the output of these will now be provided in a high-resolution preview of your image, but the display will scale to fit the iPhone/iPad device. All plug-ins, including those that provided support for layers before, make use of layers now, which if you are familiar with Photoshop will make it easier for you to work with layers, manage layers or make selections when making your adjustments, blending them out or selectively bringing them in, as well as combining layers to make new layers. If you were a loyal Nikon D3 users, you will no doubt have moved over to F-mount lenses in your camera, which in the past lead to a lack of RAW processing. Elements 3 is packed with HD video editing capabilities and offers a great selection of powerful video editing tools. In the main menu bar, there is a new video section! So instead of having it buried, the video editing menu is now part of the Media & Editing section of the program. (There is also a new Quick Mask function that allows you to handle your image as if it was a piece of graph paper, without having to outline it first. I did not mention this function earlier, because it is not as robust or easy to use as the Mist tool in the Photoshop CS5.1 version. The difference is that you add freehand ink lines as you place your elements on a new graph paper, rather than using the magnet and pen tools operated with a mouse. I found this feature much faster to use and more intuitive, than the old method.)
