When the wafer reaches a particular processing stage, it is removed from the handler and placed into a cassette for the next processing stage. In this way, the wafer can undergo as many as four or five processing steps before it reaches a standard packaging step where it is placed in a wafer carrier for transportation to a wafer carrier installation device. One of the transport operations in the handler is a wafer pickup operation. The wafer pickup operation in the prior art included a multi-grip contactor assembly in which a grasping means was provided for each contactor at a position to be reached by the wafer as it was being removed from the cassette. The contactors, which were mounted to pivot about a pivot axis, rotated outwardly as the grasping means reached the contactors, and pivoted inwardly as the grasping means released the contactors to contact the wafer and lift it from the cassette. This wafer pickup operation, however, was prone to damage the wafer and the contactor. For example, when the wafer and contactor were released from the grasping means, they could bang together causing damage to the wafer. Furthermore, the pivoting of the contactors between the grasping position and released position could cause degradation of the contactor or damage to the wafer. Also, in wafer systems where the wafer undergoes many processing steps, the cycle time for the handling step and the subsequent loading step would be increased. The Pentagon's special inspector general for Afghanistan reconstruction (SIGAR), the government's top watchdog on government-assisted reconstruction projects in Afghanistan, told Congress that President Trump's administration was
