The web app reads the `canvas` context and displays the changes made in Photoshop. The resulting image is then uploaded back to the webworker, where it is scaled down to the original dimensions and then written back to the canvas context. The basic idea behind Photoshop web app is to build an offline version of the application using the Canvas element and WebAssembly. This allows the app to run in the browser without any internet connection required. This is possible since the web engine behind Google Chrome supports WebAssembly. With the introduction of the dark mode feature, we wanted to make it easier for you to access that feature by placing it in the menu bar, so that it's always available to you. Today's update also brings long press support for features within Photoshop, so you can more easily access your favorite tools quickly. You can now pin a window to access favorites faster, and you can now quickly share images from your desktop to the web or mobile. For our first step in bringing Photoshop to the web for users, Adobe has created a beta version that runs in the browser. The beta version of Photoshop has a limited feature set, but we are working to extend this beta version with more powerful features over time. The preview shows that the interface is responsive and works well on mobile devices. The feature set available in this preview version of Adobe Photoshop is limited. It is optimized for OS X and Windows PCs. For example, file support is limited and the preview version does not support multi-layer editing or layers with clipping paths. The Photoshop web application has a rich feature set and supports file support and has multi-layer editing and layers with clipping paths. To try out this preview version of Photoshop, please make sure that you are logged into the Adobe Creative Cloud account that you use with Photoshop. If you do not have an Adobe Creative Cloud account, you can sign up for one at https://creativecloud.adobe.com . e3d0a04c9c
